Agromony Tip Sheet

As we finally head into spring, now is a good time to think about reseeding damaged pastures and worn-out hayfields. First, let's look at pastures. Do you have large areas that are damaged from feeding and high animal traffic over the winter? As the ground dries out in March it is a great time to overseed. Fescue, grazing-type orchardgrass or one of our pasture mixes may be a great fit to give new life to these areas. Seed can be broadcast and worked in with light tillage or a pasture drag, which will also help smooth the rough areas. Be sure to remove animals to give the new grass a chance to establish itself. Consider mixing in a spring forage oat or CFC's pea/oat mix to help provide cover and high-quality forage for your animals and protect the new grass seedlings from overgrazing.

For those hayfields that have thinning grass stands, there are a few options. You can overseed this spring to help thicken the stand or it may be time to completely reseed this year. Fall is the best time to reseed, but you can set yourself up for success now. Consider a spring crop of oats or pea/oat mix followed by a summer annual such as millet or sorghum-sudangrass before reseeding in early fall. This rotation of annuals will provide lots of quality forage and help to choke out any weed infestations before investing in reseeding.

Speak to your local field representative or store to find the right seed for you and to make a plan for improving your pastures and hayfields.
